WEDNESDAY EVEN'G., AUG. 27, 1873

A ROYAL BORROWER,-Henry the Sixth of England was always berrowing and borrowing, the latter at a very burdensome rate; for when, ia 1439, he wanted a loan of seven thousand marks of Cardinal Beaufort, his kind uncle, not satisfied with the deposit of the Rich Col-lar, obtained the Skyngton Collar also, besides three gold tablets of St. George, Our Lady, and Christ's Passion; a great alms dish made in manner of a ship full of men of arms fighting upon the ship side; divers chargers, chalices, basics, pots and saucers; and, last, but not least, the sword of Spain, a golden weapon decked with sapphires—all, moreover, to become the absolute property of the cardinal unless redeemed within a year. That the king ever enjoyed his own again does not appear probable, seeing that a few years afterward he could pay the Earl of Buckingham and his men for their services in France only by transferring a tablet, a little bell, and two basics of gold to that noblemen's keeping; things of little account in the estimation of a monarch who, if Shakspeare pictures him truly, would gladly have exchanged places with the homely swain, and spent his hours sitting on a hill "to carve out dials quaintly, point by point."
